The shift from winter's dry chill to spring's milder warmth triggers a rise in precipitation—which is why April often feels like nature's care wash. The rain in April sets the stage for vibrant blooms in May. Flowers and plants need 3 ingredients to thrive: water, sunlight and warmth. April's showers soak the ground and replenish the soil moisture levels, giving seeds and roots the hydration they need to grow. By the time May rolls around, temperatures have usually warmed up enough to trigger growth and blooming. This combination of moisture and warmth is why you see gardens and fields bursting with color in May.
